I wore through 5 pairs of 1626 work boots, resoled two of them, and then the boot was discontinued. (I had Redwing resole each time and both pairs felt entirely different under foot, so much so that it was throwing off my alignment) I went ahead and bought the steel toed version but they're heavier, swetier in the summer, colder in the winter and have much less room in the toe box. I'm working on my knees a lot and these boots don't respond well to that function and my toes take a beating. If you're standing a lot for work and require a steel toe this could possibly work, but if you're outside in the winter don't count on them for warmth. All I got to say is, when the heck will boot companies start making quality, effective work boots for women? Without the cute details, bad colors and extremely poor selection? It's ridiculous how many work boots are carried for men and how little for women, and every company gives me the same line- there's just no demand. At the very least bring back the 1626, and I encourage Red wing to poll the audience a bit more to get a better feel for the womens market. I'm not a complainer normally, I'm just heading into the work season with no boots to count on, and that makes my job tough. Big fan of the company, they just need to catch up with the times.

40 years in red wings

I started in heavy highway construction and now haul hazardous materials. Every year in red wing boots, they were the only ones to offer women's boots so I've stayed with red wing.

AWESOME!

I am very hard on boots. I typically walk out of a pair in about 4-6 months. I bought these boots about 7 months ago and can hardly see any wear on the sole. The break in period is short, they are very comfortable to wear on a day to day basis.... not to mention they last! Love love love these boots!

This product is a good work boot.

I am a Dairy Farmer living in Wisconsin, with narrow feet, therefore need to buy a woman's shoe. I always buy #1626. I understand I can no longer buy that boot; the new one has a steel toe. I feel badly about that, because a steel toe shoe is heavier and colder. Will you in the future consider making it without the steel toe? I would really appreciate it. Thanks.

I have had a pair of these boots for 8 years. I am in the process of purchasing another pair. Only because the pair I am wearing now doesn't have much tread left on them. I love these boots. I wouldn't buy another brand, which is making it difficult for me to find a local store that carries them in my size. I would recommend these boots every time. They are definitely worth what I paid for them, which wasn't a bad price at that.

Deeply disappointed

Being a loyal red wing customer for every 20 years, they we re my first stop when I needed new work boots. I usually special order a man's boot in small size but I needed work boots with steel toes ASAP and they had none in my size. The first eyelet broke the first day I wore them with the other 3 out 4 breaking the same week. These were the first women's work boots I've bought from red wings and my last. When will someone actually make a decent workbook for women?

I agree I'm super disappointed I've been wearing my boots for only 2 months and the tongue is completely over to the side on one of the boots. I brought them in after a second time and they said they are going to stitch the tongue to the side of the boot?!?! is this normal... you spend 200 for the tongue not to be correct in the first place. They eyelet is literally digging into my foot and the solution is to stitch the tongue to the boot itself.. so now ill have to hassle to get it on... anyone else have this problem...is this really how they fix things...completely disappointed with this boot, and the fact that there are really no options for women in the construction trades really makes me angry...ughhh

I had the same issue with the eyelets snapping. But I took them into the store by my house and the gentleman working there told me that the hardware is guaranteed and he sent them in to be repaired and even though only two broke, he had them replace all four free of charge. Its well worth it to take them into the store if there is one by you because Red Wing is more than willing to fix any issues in order to keep happy and forever customers.

I've had these boots for over 3 years and they are still going strong. The toes have worn through to the steel on the exterior from excessive rubbing on the ground (I am a tile setter). This person must have just got a defective pair. These are by far the BEST boots I have ever owned.
